

The background is a textured, abstract composition. It features a dominant teal or blue-green color with visible brushstrokes and a fine, light-colored grid pattern. In the upper center, there is a faint, rectangular area of reddish-brown color. At the bottom, there is a horizontal band of darker, more saturated red and purple tones, also with visible texture.

CHRISTOPHER
COLM
MORRIN

BARK LAB
curated by Nicola E. Petek

CHRISTOPHER
COLM
MORRIN

Unknown Landscapes

“The landscape thinks itself in me, and I am
it’s consciousness.”

Paul Cézanne

I visited Christopher Colm Morrin’s studio for the first time on a spring afternoon in 2021. As I stepped through the door I immediately felt as if being welcomed into his inner world. While looking at the canvases and talking to him, I instantly recognized in the paintings an internal radiance that appeared to stem from their ability to harbour parts of the artist. The same felt true the other way around as both artist and image inevitably mirrored fragments of each other.

French painter Paul Cézanne liked to describe his work with a single word: to realise (fr. réaliser) or realisation (fr. réalisation). The word summarises succinctly what he considered to be the core of the artistic creation: To see in order to perceive, to reflect in order to understand and to paint in order to visualise what has been discovered.¹ In October 1907, after his encounter with Cézanne’s work at the Salon d’Automne in Paris, Rainer Maria Rilke wrote to his wife Clara, “The painter is not likely to come to the consciousness of his insights [...]: without taking the diversions through his reflection, his progress, itself mysterious to him, must enter so rapidly into the work that he is unable to recognise it at the moment of its passage.”² Morrin’s paintings seem to tread a middle path between Rilke’s assertion and Cézanne’s beliefs. His

Detail on previous page:

Vision 2021 | oil on canvas | 15 x 44 cm

landscapes do not strive to reflect the appearances of reality but rather to be immediate reflections of the soul's cartography. Through his journey the painter embraces the magical and the unknown, accepting the importance of facing the rough edges within the topography of ourselves, while trusting love and kindness as guidance. Every picture strikes us as a landmark. Bright markers for moments of assurance and stillness amid confusion and despair. For even if the path is partially shadowed, there is always light opposing the darkness. On the canvases, dark surfaces are broken to frame luminous elements or glistening horizons. Out of the darkness, our eyes are led towards vibrant colours promising hope and tranquility.

Morrin originally studied psychoanalysis and philosophy and has always been fascinated with wanting to understand the mind. Carl G. Jung is one of many influences on his way of viewing the world, which has allowed the artist to accept the concealed realms within himself. His paintings invite us to look inside and call upon our imagination once again. As we experience them, they offer us the opportunity to let go of all judgements and all mental presumptions.

These landscapes, if one may call them so, are thus sceneries that serve as momentaneous reflections of the mind. While seeing them, they open up a safe space in which we can acknowledge our darkness, inhabit our pain, and embrace our struggle with compassion and understanding. By relentlessly confronting his vulnerability, Morrin allows us to admit our weaknesses while encouraging us to accept them with open minds and hearts. By contemplating his paintings they bring us closer to realising that we must listen in order to understand, to break down the boundaries of our own thoughts to let answers in, and to accept within oneself that life, above it all, is extraordinarily mysterious.

Nicola E. Petek

¹ BOEHM, Gottfried: Paul Cézanne. Montagne Sainte-Victoire, Frankfurt am Main 1988, p. 54.

² RILKE, Rainer Maria: Über moderne Malerei, Editor: Martina Krießnach-Thomasberger, (quote translated by Nicola E. Petek), Frankfurt am Main/Leipzig 2000, p. 50.

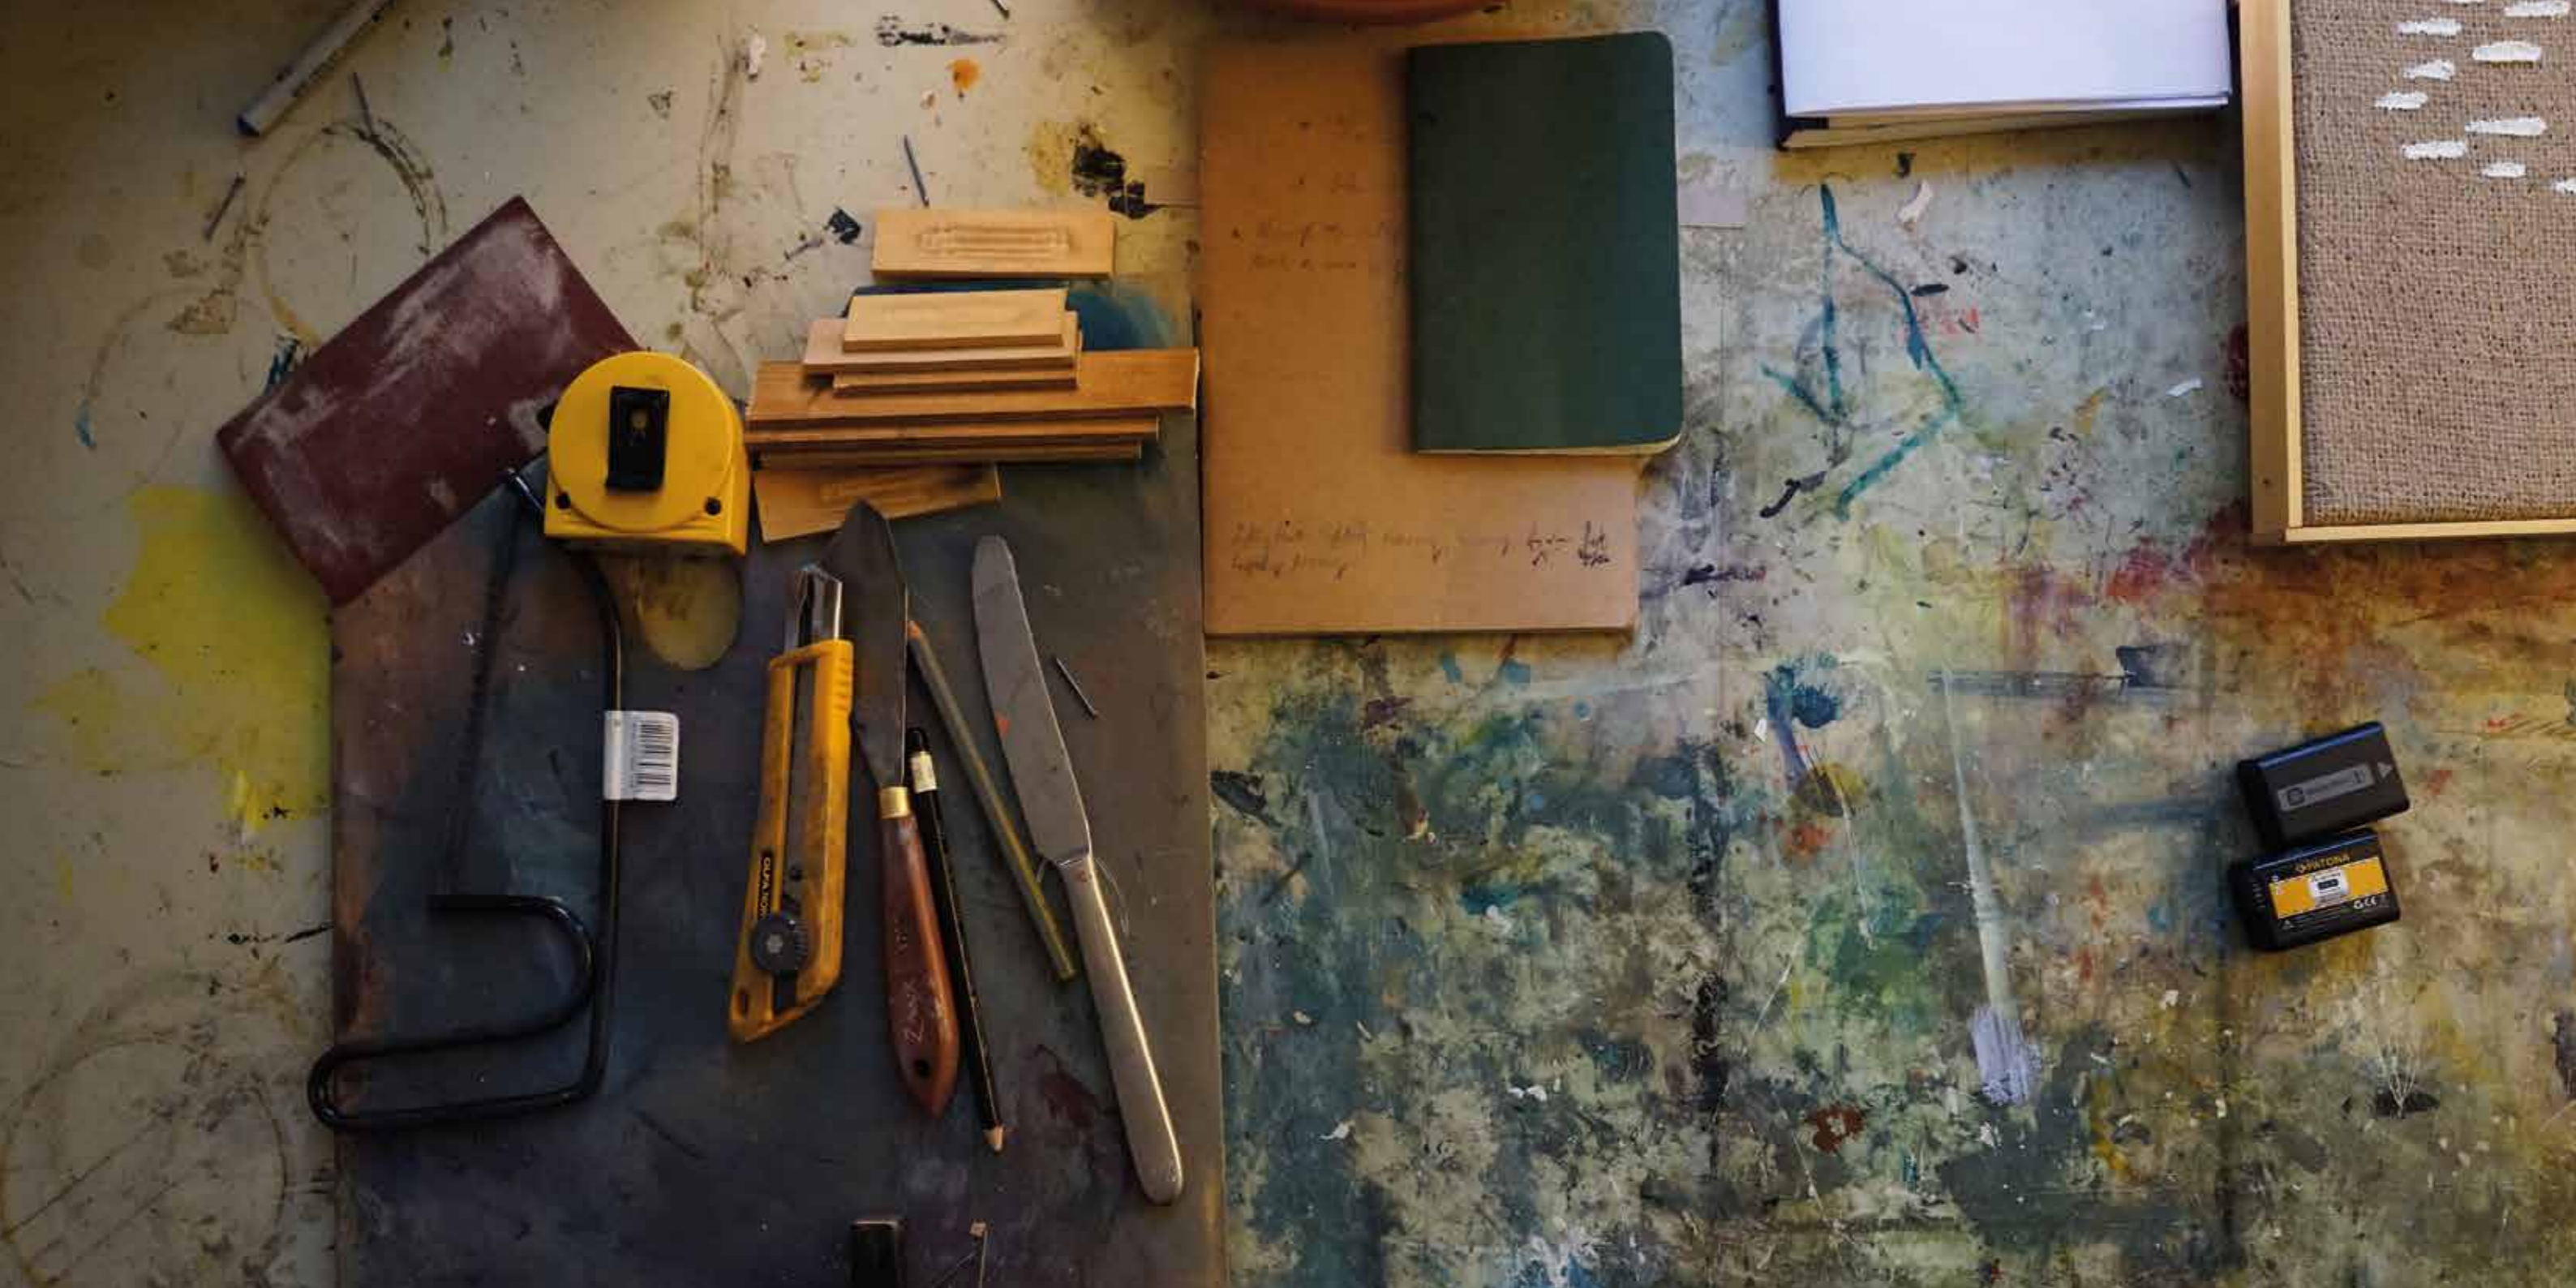

CHRISTOPHER COLM MORRIN

* 1980 in Dublin, Ireland

BA in Psychology & Philosophy

Major in Psychoanalytic Therapy from DBS University, Dublin, Ireland

Lives and works in Berlin, Germany

SELECTED EXHIBITIONS

2021

Selected Works, curated by Rosanna Wilson
Stephens, Wilson Stephens & Jones Gallery,
London, England

Different Shades Of Abstraction, curated by Jeanine Hofland (Althuis Hofland Fine Arts),
BÜRO KIF, Amsterdam, Netherlands

Days of Heartbreak, curated by Nicola E. Petek, Pony Royal, Berlin, Germany

Lusus Naturae, curated by Vanessa Souli, BcmA,
Berlin, Germany

2019

Rare, curated by Anémone Caroyal, Anomalie
Art Club, Berlin, Germany

2018

Craw, curated by Dee Mulrooney and others,
Kultstätte Keller, Berlin, Germany

2017

Riso, curated by Vetro Editions, Urban Spree,
Berlin, Germany

This catalogue is published on the occasion of the exhibition

Christopher Colm Morrin
Unknown Landscapes

curated by Nicola E. Petek

6–22 February 2022

BARK Lab
Köthenerstraße 28
10963 Berlin
info@bark-lab.de www.bark-lab.de

Design & Editing
Eli Freitag

Cover
Morning Veil, 2021, oil on canvas, 30 x 50 cm

Text
Nicola E. Petek

Photography
Courtesy of the artist
Tobias Brust (Portrait p. 35)

Printing
Druckerei Heenemann, Berlin

2022

BARK
LAB

